Book Reviews

What makes this letter of Wesley important enough to be republished? To answer that question, the reader of it must remember that it was written nearly ten years after the author’s direct involvement in the evangelical revival that had begun with field preaching near Bristol. Strident opposition had not caused him to despair. Pulpits in his beloved Anglican Church had been closed to him, and severe criticism mounted against the use of new ways of proclamation and nurture; but undeterred he had continued his ministry and rejoiced in the multiplying fruits in England.

Since landing in Ireland April 15, 1749, he had been faced both with mob violence and caustic charges that his movement was “all Jesuitism at the bottom.” Nevertheless he had seen a number of persons converted to faith in Christ; encouragement to previously established societies had brought joy to all concerned; and he had established several new societies. Then on July 12 he had preached to a very large congregation which seems to have included Anglicans, Dissenters, and Roman Catholics. To his great surprise there was no mob violence. A Letter to a Roman Catholic came from his pen six days later. It conveys, among other things, his growing yearning for accord and unity among Christians so as to open the way for a more effective Christian mission to the unreached.

Members of some denominations committed to the ecumenical movement are known to wonder if ecumenism is not a modern fad for which there is no biblical support and little evidence in the history of Christianity. John Wesley not only underscored the importance of the unity of Christians in his preaching ministry, but in this Letter he so compassionately and clearly sets forth the essential marks of unity that participants in the contemporary ecumenical movement find the letter fresh in its appeal and practical in its recommendations for action.

The practice should long since have ended, Wesley says, when historic churches perpetuate old suspicions and distrust of one another. Moreover, renewal movements instead of inadvertently causing a schismatic and sectarian spirit should be welcomed as prime promoters of such increased understanding and charity as to evoke endeavors “to help each other on in whatever we are agreed leads to the kingdom.” Although our ecumenical vision may be more comprehensive in scope than Wesley’s, his guiding principle anticipated that expressed both by the Faith and Order Conference at Lund in 1952 and by the more recent Decree on Ecumenism of the second Vatican Council, namely, “collaboration according to conscience.”

How very contemporary the power of Wesley’s appeal is for all Christians to begin cooperating so as to more effectively undergird the Christian enterprise is evident in the fact that this republication of the Letter is edited and has an introduction by Michael Hurley, an Irish Jesuit, and that it has prefaces by Bishop Odd Hagen, President of the World Methodist Council, and by the late Augustin Cardinal Bea, first President of the Vatican Secretariat for Christian Unity.

Surely every United Methodist interested in helping to manifest a church "truly evangelical" and "truly catholic" will want not only to be nurtured by Wesley's insights on unity, but also be encouraged to recommend the use of it as a stimulus for Catholic-Protestant dialogue. It is an unusually appropriate document for such a time as ours.
