President’s Letter by Wm. C. Hardt

It’s been a busy three months since the last edition of the TUMHS Newsletter. Your editor had the great pleasure of attending two dedication services for historic site designations at Pasadena First UMC and Grace UMC. McMahan’s Chapel celebrated 177 years of proclaiming the faith in East Texas. You will read in a related article about a creative project in the Central Texas Conference. They have created a garden on the campus of Texas Wesleyan University. Our friends in the New Mexico Conference are really on the ball. They have announced the program for next summer’s Jurisdictional Convocation of Archivists (see related article) If you ever had any idea you might want to attend a jurisdictional convocation, 2012 will be the year.

Another positive development is that we are receiving more inquiries from university graduate students researching Texas Methodist history topics. Your editor has received inquiries requesting research help from students at Perkins, Iliff, Rice, and the University of Houston. According to several articles in the Chronicle of Higher Education, university course offerings in the history of religion are increasing. As religion has become more prominent in our politics and public dialogue, it is natural that historians would become more interested in it. In 2008 Jeremiah Wright, a pastor in Chicago, became a household name. In 2011 the campaign of a Mormon for his party’s presidential nomination is again holding the magnifying glass up to the role of religion in American history.

We are naturally pleased at the resurgence of interest in religious history as demonstrated by more university course offerings on the subject, a steady stream of local church histories, and inquiries from seminarians, university students, local church historians, and genealogists. On the other hand, we are continually disappointed in the ignorance of American religious history as displayed by commentators on the talk shows and news television programs. In their quest for ratings, they tend to concentrate on the eccentric and bizarre rather than the mainstream. So it is that we moderate Methodists are rarely featured in the popular press and then usually when there is scandal or controversy.

The same is true for our history. Our Methodist archives are stuffed with reports, journals, minutes, and other documents that show people going about their business of work, worship, and service. It’s not the stuff that makes for sensational headlines or history, but is probably more important than most things that do.
Central Texas Conference Cornerstone Garden

The Discipline of the United Methodist Church tasks conference commissions of Archives and History with collecting the records of closed churches. It also authorizes those commissions to salvage the cornerstones of abandoned church buildings. The following report from Jean Traster tells how the Central Texas Conference is meeting that responsibility in a creative way.

The dedication of the Central Texas Conference Cornerstone Garden took place on October 22 at 10 AM at Texas Wesleyan University. Seven cornerstones from closed churches have been gathered from across the conference, and are in place in the Garden at the present time. The stones date from 1895 to 1969, and represent various sizes of congregations no longer in existence. One marker is from the Methodist River Oaks Apartments in Waco, a project of the former West Texas Conference, Central Jurisdiction, which provided non-segregated housing for low income families.

The Garden is located in a tree-shaded area of the campus with a fountain and pond, benches, gravel and stepping stone walkways, and many varieties of native Texas vegetation and flowers. Already it has become a favorite site on the campus for students to study and visit with one another.

Texas Wesleyan University is located southeast of downtown Fort Worth. If you visit the Cornerstone Garden, you might also want to include a tour of the West Library which houses the Central Texas Conference Archives. You will also want to tour the historic Polytechnic United Methodist Church at the corner of Collard and E. Rosedale on the southeast corner of the TWU campus. Polytechnic was founded in 1892.

CLOSED CHURCH AT LOTT

As mentioned in the previous article, the conference CAH collects records of closed churches. Here are photos of the church at Lott in Falls County that your editor recently visited in order to secure records.
